Clinching The Win

By Peggy Fehily

High school teams from all over Europe gathered Thursday night to compete for the International Scrabble Tournament title. The students have been practicing for months -- from weekend games with their families, to team meetings to discuss strategies and memorize word lists, each step brings them closer to a championship. For many of these students, Scrabble isn't a game; it's a way of life. Some of the team members on the Romanian team started playing when they were only 6 years old! Many of the players idolize Karl Khoshnaw, who is famous for sending the Scrabble world reeling a few years ago by earning 392 points with the word CAZIKUES. The winning team followed Khoshnaw's example by using the triple word score spaces to their advantage. Though they couldn't quite achieve the feat of utilizing two such spaces in a single word, they still managed to clinch a victory with the word CURATOR. They hope to continue the winning streak in next season's competition, for which they have already begun preparing.

A Day for the Maximum Decibels

By Leonardo Guardian

Today's televised 16-hour assault on eardrums across the globe from Wembley and Philadelphia is not only unquestionably well meant and well timed but also highly appropriate for its decibel level. In a world increasingly equipped with instant means of communicating information, propaganda and entertainment it becomes harder and harder to get attention and well nigh impossible to keep it. Millions of people round the world will find it difficult not to notice today's unprecedented telethon, and with luck it will cause another tidal wave of generosity. But the hunger which immediately menaces half the continent is only one aspect, albeit the most obviously horrific, of Africa's multiple crises, which has become a gigantic vicious circle. As we reported on Thursday, relief workers are becoming increasingly angry and frustrated because aid which is only case inadequate is also held up by logistical problems. Bad
